

How does Congress pass bills?

Why did our Founding Fathers make it so difficult to pass laws?

Do you think they were right or wrong to do so? Why?

A bill has to go through many steps before it becomes a law. First, Congress has to make a law. The Senate and the House of Representatives both have to pass it. If the bill passes that point, then the bill will go to the president. Then, the president can veto the bill or sign it. The Supreme Court can say that the law is unconstitutional if it thinks it isn't right.

I think it is good that bills go through many steps. People from one group can make a mistake. A law should be something to better the people. I think our Founding Fathers made it difficult to pass laws because only good laws would get passed. I think they were right to do so because if they didn't, we would have dumb laws.

- Bianca Anderson